

Many first-year computer science students at the University of South Carolina struggle to manage their time effectively between coding projects, coursework, and personal commitments, leading to increased stress and declines in academic performance.